VI. In Grammar.

16. A name for the adjectives the (Definite Article) and a, an (Indefinite Article), and their equivalents in other languages, sometimes considered to form a distinct Part of Speech.

In this sense representing the L. articulus, a term used in Latin as early as the time of Quintilian as a transl. of the Gr. ἄρθρον, to denote the Gr. ὁ, ἡ, τό = the. The inclusion of a and its equivalents belongs to the grammar of the modern languages. Palsgrave (1530) makes two articles in Fr., ung and le, but he does not seem to know the terms Definite and Indefinite—which were possibly taken (in a new sense) from the language of the ancient Stoic grammarians who (using ἄρθρα ὡρισμένα or Definite articles, and ἄρθρα ἀοριστικά or Indefinite articles; the former being with them our personal pronouns, the latter the other pronouns and demonstratives including the art i, ἡ, τό = the. The exact sense in which ἄρθρον was first used in grammar is uncertain. (I. Bywater.)

Introd. 14 Besydes the viii partes of speche commen betwene them and the latines, they have also a nynth part of reason whiche I call article, borrowyng the name of the Grekes. 1532 More Confut. Gram. 62 There are two articles, a and the. These are really Nouns Adjective, and are used almost after the same Manner as other Adjectives. Therefore I have not made the Article (as some have done) a distinct Part of Speech. 1867 N. & Q. Ser. III. XI. 52/1 Sir William Davenant contrived to write a poem 'the London Vacation' almost without the use of Articles.

-ary¹, suffix of adjs. and sbs., ad. L. -āri-us, -āri-um. The regular phonetic repr. of these in OF. was -air, but most of the words that actually lived on into OF. had -ier (app. by confusion with words in -iārium or -erium, of which -ier was the regular repr.), in AFr. -er, instances of which still remain in Eng. primer, danger, antiphoner, and names of trades and offices, like carpenter, usher (Fr. huissier, L. ostiārius), while others, as bursar, calendar, mortar, vicar, have recently been refashioned with -ar after Latin. But in words of later learned adaptation in Fr., -ārius, -um were represented by -aire; in AFr. and ME. -arie, later -arye, now -ary, as L. contrārius, Fr. contraire, Eng. contrarie, contrarye, now contrary; and this is the regular form in which L. words in -ārius, -arium, or their Fr. representatives in -aire are now adapted in Eng., and on which new analogical formations are modelled. More than 300 such exist in the language, comprising:—

A. adjs. repr. (or on analogy of) L. -ārius 'connected with, pertaining to'; as arbitrary, contrary, elementary, honorary, mercenary, necessary, primary, secondary, tertiary, voluntary.

B. sbs. 1. repr. (or on analogy of) L. -ārius 'a man (or male) belonging to or engaged in'; as actuary, adversary, antiquary, apothecary, commentary (liber), February, January (mensis), lapidary, secretary.

2. repr. (or on analogy of) L. -ārium 'a thing connected with or employed in, a place for'; as aviary, breviary, diary, dictionary, formulary, glossary, granary, ovary, piscary, reliquary, salary, sanctuary, vocabulary. See also -ARIUM.

3. repr. L. (often mediæval) -āria (Fr. -aire, -arie), forming fem. sbs. with same sense; as Calvary, fritillary.

-ary², suffix of adjs.; occasional ad. L. -ār-is (stem -āri) 'of the kind of, belonging to.' Of this the regular repr. in mod. Eng. is -AR¹, q.v. But even in Latin several of these words had forms both in -āris and -ārius; and in later Fr. words of literary introduction, both these L. endings are levelled under -aire, e.g. L. contrārius, militāris, Fr. contraire, militaire. Hence, as Fr. -aire from -ārius gives -ary in Eng., Fr. -aire from -āris has occasionally also been adapted as -ary instead of the more regular -ar; e.g. capillary, exemplary, maxillary, military, salutary.

Aryan, Arian (ē·riăn, ă·riăn), a. and sb. [f. Sanskrit ārya, in the later language 'noble, of good family,' but apparently in earlier use a national name 'comprising the worshippers of the gods of the Brahmans' (Max Müller); cf. Zend airya 'venerable,' also a national name, and Old Persian (Achæmenian) ariya national name (applied to himself by Darius Hystaspes); whence probably Gr. Ἀρεία, Ἀρία, L. Aria, Ariana, and Ariānus, the eastern part of ancient Persia, and Pehlevi and mod.Pers. Irân 'Persia.' As a transl. of L. Ariānus 'of Aria or Ariana,' Arian has long been in English use: Aryan is of recent introduction in Comparative Philology, and is also by many written Arian, on the ground that āria was the original word, as shown by the Vedic language, ārya being only the later Sanskrit form; the spelling Aryan has the advantage of distinguishing the word from ARIAN in Eccl. Hist.]

A. adj. Applied by some to the great division or family of languages, which includes Sanskrit, Zend, Persian, Greek, Latin, Celtic, Teutonic, and Slavonic, with their modern representatives; also called Indo-European, Indo-Germanic, and sometimes Japhetic; by others restricted to the Asiatic portion of these. absol. The original Aryan or Arian language.

The restricted use rests on the ground that only the ancient Indian and Iranian members of the family are known on historical evidence to have called themselves Aria, Arya or Ariya; the wider application rests partly on the inference that the name probably belonged in pre-historic times to the whole family, while this still constituted an ethnic and linguistic unity; and partly on the ground that even if it did not, it is now the most convenient and least misleading name for the primitive type of speech from which all the languages above-mentioned have sprung, inasmuch as Indo-Germanic is too narrow, and Indo-European too wide, for the facts, while Japhetic introduces speculations of which science has no cognizance. A frequent use of the word, in which all agree, is to distinguish the Aryan from the non-Aryan languages of India, the former being 'Aryan' whether the term is used in the restricted or the wider sense.

As (æz, ĕz, əz), adv. (conj., and rel. pron.) Forms: 1-3 alswá, al-swá, (WS. 1-2 ealswá). North. 2-6 alswa (alsua), 4-5 alsa, alse, 4-7 ala, 4- as. Midl. 3-4 alswo, alsuo, 3-6 also, 4-6 alse, ala, 3- as, (4-5 os). South. 2-3 alse, 2-4 ase, 2- as. [A worn-down form of all-so, OE. all-swá 'wholly so, quite so, just so,' which in its simple demonstrative use remains dissyllabic (see ALSO), but as a relative and antecedent has been phonetically weakened through alswá, alsa, alse, als, as, and alswi, alswo, also, alse, ase, as, to (æz). This phonetic weakening, in each of its successive stages, began with the relative sense, whence it extended to the other senses: even the weak demonstrative was reduced in north. dial. to als, but remains also in standard Eng. The correlation in 'the colour is as bright as gold,' where the first as is demonstrative or antecedent, and the second relative, 'in that degree bright, in which degree gold (is bright),' was originally expressed by so—so, OE. 'swá beorht swá gold'; but the antecedent or principal form was also strengthened by all, 'all swá beorht swá gold'; constructions which long survived in the south, as 'sŏ briht sŏ (se) gold,' and 'al sŏ (alse) briht sŏ (se) gold.' The prefixed all, though originally emphatic (= altogether, quite, even), soon lost its force, and al-swá, al-so came to imply no more than the simple swá, sŏ. Hence, by 1100 (in the north) alswa had begun to appear in the subordinate clause likewise, 'alswa brihht alswa gold,' a construction soon generally adopted, though almost always with the relative in a phonetically weaker form than the antecedent, e.g. 'alswa briht alse gold, also briht alse gold, alse brigt ase gold, als bricht as gold,' but finally with both correlatives worn down, 'as bright as gold.' Alse, ase, as was even substituted as the relative, when the original swá, so remained as the antecedent, whence the mod. 'not so bright as gold,' OE. ná swá beorht swá gold, 13th c. southern Eng. 'nowht so briht sŏ (se) gold,' and 'nowht so briht alse (ase) gold.'

With the wearing down of al-so to as, cf. mod. Ger. also, als, in 'also bald als er kam' = ME. 'al-so sone als he com,' mod. 'as soon as he came.'

With many common adjectives and adverbs as (als, etc.) was formerly written in combination, especially in idiomatic constructions, e.g. asmuch, aswell, asfaste, assoon, astite; relics of this survive in forasmuch, inasmuch, whereas.]

The uses of as are here considered, A. in the main sentence, B. in the subordinate sentence, C. in phrases. At the end of B. are some phraseological combinations originating in ellipsis.

VI. Introducing an attributive clause; after the antecedents such, same, or their equivalents.

23. The adjective such (OE. swylc, swylċ, Goth. swa-leik) contains the adv. swa, so, and may be analyzed as 'so-constituted': like so, therefore, it is followed by as: see above, 19 b. b. Same was in OE. an adv. followed by swa. Hence, after such and same, as comes, through ellipsis, to act as a relative pronoun = That, who, which.

But same as usually expresses identity of kind, same that absolute identity, except in contracted sentences where same as is alone found: cf. 'he uses the same books as you do,' 'he uses the same books that you do,' 'he uses the same books as you,' 'you and he use the same books.'

Lect.* ii. 31 Bees like the same odours as we do.

†24. The antecedent such is also replaced by that, those, or entirely omitted, leaving as an ordinary relative pronoun = That, who, which. Cf. Norse use of som. Obs. in standard English, but common dial. in England and the United States.

c 1305 St. Edmund 225 in E. E. P. (1862) 77 Draugtes as me drawep in poudre. 1366 Maundrv. v. 36 The firste Soudan was Zarocon .. as was fadre to Sahaladyn. 1475 *Bk. 1663 Marvell Corr. Wks. 1872-5 II. 140 If they had any thing as that remained on their part.

¶ As (after such or that), frequently represents not merely the simple relative, but the relative with its governing preposition; and then approaches the adverbial use in 6.

26. Introducing instances in exemplification or illustration of a general designation: Like and including, such as, of the kind of; for instance, for example.

Apparently an elliptical use of 23, 24; thus, 'a beast of prey, as the lion or tiger' = 'a beast of prey, such as the lion or tiger is,' where as is a relative pronoun, though in the elliptical sentence, it sinks into a conjunction.

1340 Hampole Pr. Consc. 700 Many yuels, angers, and mescheefes Oft comes til man .. Als feuyr, dropsy, and launya. c 1380 Wyclif Prelates iii. 27. From its relative or conjunctive force, as was added (rarely prefixed) to the demonstrative adverbs there, then, thither, thence, after, to make them conjunctive; it was used for some time with the interrogatives where, when, whither, whence, after they were substituted for the demonstratives. When as is found in modern poets as an archaism; the others are Obs. Cf. when that, after that; and see Whereas, in which the local sense is now lost.

Aslope (ăslō·p), a. and adv. [Evidence is wanting to show the exact history of this, and its relation to SLOPE; prob. it is later form of OE. aslopen, pa. pple. of aslúpan, lit. Difficulty attaches to either derivation, as well as to that of slope itself, from the want of instances of slopen, aslopen, or the verbs to which they belonged, between the OE. period and the 15th c.; the second has the additional difficulty that, so far as evidence goes, slope appeared still later than aslope, and may have been an aphetic form. Slope vb. and sb. are comparatively recent derivatives of slope adj. In the absence of evidence, it is impossible to say whether aslope is primarily an adverb, like alive, afoot, or a participial adjective which only follows its sb., like awake, athirst, since these two classes of words run together in use.]

About 1600 the influence of herbalists and horticultural writers made asparagus familiar, and this in the aphetic form 'sparagus at length displaced sperage, but was itself by popular etymol. corrupted before 1650 to sparagrass, sparrow-grass, which remained the polite name during the 18th c. Botanists still wrote asparagus, but according to Walker Pron. Dict. 1791, 'Sparrow-grass is so general that asparagus has an air of stiffness and pedantry.' B. sb.

1. A consonantal sound in which the action of the breath is prominently marked ; one which is followed by or blended with the sound of H.

(Modern phonologists generally apply the term to a consonantal diphthong consisting of a mute or stop followed by 'the slipping-out of an audible bit of Hatus or aspiration, between the breach of mute-closure and the following sound' (Whitney), which is believed to be the character of the Sanskrit 'aspirates,' and to have been the original value of the Gr. χ, θ, φ. But the term is also applied in Gr. grammar to the current fricative value of these letters; and in the Roman alphabet generally to any modification of sound indicated by the addition of h ; e. g. to the Celtic bh, mh (= v, and nasalised v) ; in Hebrew it has been given to the gutturals, and in other languages it has been used with similar vagueness).

1727-51 Chambers Cycl. s.v., Some .. write the aspirates, or letters aspirated. Ibid. The eastern languages which do not express the vowels, do yet express the Aspirates. 1829 Mrs. Schimmelpenninck Princ. Beauty III. iii. § 31 Gutturals, and rough aspirates, and strongly marked consonants are the most sudden and forcible inflections. 1879 Whitney Skr. Gram. 13 That the aspirates, all of them, are real mutes or contact sounds, and not fricatives (like European th, sh, ch, etc.) is beyond question.

2. The simple sound of the letter H, or its equivalent the πνεῦμα δασύ, or spiritus asper (ʽ) of Greek grammar. Esp. applied to the initial h- so often 'dropped,' or improperly inserted, by the uneducated in England.

1725 Pope Pref. Homer, The feebler Æolic which often rejects its aspirate or takes off its accent. 1872 Geo. Eliot Middlem. xxxv. (1873) 296 A Middlemarch mercer of polite manners and superfluous aspirates. 1877 Punch 18 Aug. 65 Our old Cockney friend, 'Arry, who is weak in aspirates.

¶ Some writers have altered this word to asperate, after the spiritus asper of the Latin grammarians, an ingenious but unfounded conceit.

Ass (æs). Forms : 1-2 assa, 2 8 asse, 3- ass (3-5 as, 3 has, 4-5 a nasse). Pl. 4- asses : 1 assan, 2 4 assen, 3-4 asse (southern). [OE. assa m. has no exact analogue in the cognate langs. OE. had also gesol, app. for gesel, gesil, the common Teut. form, = OS. and OHG. esil (mod.G. esel, Du. ezel), Goth. asilus, like the Celtic and Slav. names (OIrish asal, Lith. asilas, OSlav. osl :— osilu*-) evidently ad. L. asinus. From the Celtic was the Old Northumbrian asal, assal, assald, the only form in Lindisf. Gospels (occurs 10 times). Of the latter, assa was perh. a diminutive, formed like the dim. proper names Ceadda, Ælla, Offa, etc., which at length displaced the earlier gesol. Assa had also fem. assen, on the type of fyxen, wylfen, wælfen, which did not survive into ME., where he-asse, she-asse, occur already in Wyclif. Jack ass, Jenny-ass are modern familiar appellations.

The reputed OE. fem. assa seems to be an error founded on assen folen in which ass is no more fem. than are lion, tiger, in lion's whelp, tiger's cub. The ON. asna f., asni m. appear to be independent late adaptations of L. asina, asinus, not actually connected with the OE. The Celtic,

Teut., and Slavonic can hardly have been independent adoptions of the L.: the Slav. was apparently taken through Teutonic: was the latter through Celtic? The Ass had no original Aryan name: L. asinus, Gr. ὄνος (= ϝονος), were prob. of Semitic origin: cf. Heb. אתון athôn, she-ass.]

1. A well-known quadruped of the horse kind, distinguished from the horse by its smaller size, long ears, tuft at end of tail, and black stripe across the shoulders. Found wild in western and south-western Asia, where it has been used from the earliest ages as a beast of burden, and whence, in later times, it appears to have been introduced as a domestic animal into Europe.

(In familiar use, the name ass is now to a great extent superseded by donkey (in Scotland cuddie); but ass is always used in the language of Scripture, Natural History, proverb, and fable; also, in ordinary use, in Ireland.)

Pr. assatz, OSp. asaz, Pg. assaz, assas, It. assai:—late pop. L. ad satis 'to sufficiency,' substituted for simple satis 'enough.' It was originally singular but was soon (from its final -s, and collective sense) treated as plural, and in modern use has a singular asset.]

12. Hence (usually in pl.): The sessions held periodically in each county of England, for the purpose of administering civil and criminal justice, by judges acting under certain special commissions (chiefly and usually, but not exclusively, being ordinary judges of the superior courts, or, since 1875, of the Supreme Court).

It was provided by Magna Carta that the judges should visit each county once every year to take assizes (i.e. try writs of assize) of novel disseisin, mort d'ancestre, and darreine presentment (so that the jury who constituted the Grand Assize (see 11) might not be obliged to travel from remote corners of England to appear in court at Westminster). Thence the names assises, and justices or judges of assize, still retained by these circuit courts and itinerant judges, after their judicial functions have been greatly extended in various directions, especially in that of the trial of felonies and offences.

OF. estone-r, estuner. estouner (now étonner) to stun, strike senseless, stupefy, shock, astonish:—L. extonāre*, f ex out + tonāre to thunder: cf. cl. L. attonāre to strike with a thunderbolt, stun, stupefy. See A- pref. 9. The nature of its relation to STUN is as yet doubtful; connexion with mod.G. staunen, erstaunen, uncertain.]

(The form-history is rendered more difficult by the ME. habit of spelling on for un (cf. son, sun; ton, tun; done, dun; some, sum; won, wont, etc.), which probably obtained here, since Gower rhymed astone, sune (= OE. sunu, son), Chaucer astoned, woned (= OE., wunnad, wont), and 15th c. writers had still astun. OF. o, u, sometimes gives Eng. u as in tun, gum, sum; sometimes ou, ow (through ū) as in crown, sound, round, confound; hence the forms astun, astoun; the late aston seems, like astony, astonish, to have been influenced by later F. estonner; astoon may have been a phonetic spelling of astān; astoyne is unexplained. STUN (q. v.) is of later appearance, and so far as evidence goes, seems to be an aphetic form of astun. These words do not appear to have any connexion with OE. stunlan to resound (the sense 'impinge' was only a bad guess of Junius, repeated by Lye, etc.); but, both in meaning and form, it is difficult to consider them not related to G. staunen, erstaunen, a modern word adopted in 18th century from Swiss stônen, for which German scholars would seek a Teutonic etymology: see Grimm, Kluge. From astone and its pa. pples. astoned, astun'd, astound, have arisen the variants astony, astonied, whence again astonish, astonished, with their derivatives; also a new vb. astound, and pple. astounded, with their derivatives. To astun, astony, astonish, astound, are thus all of common origin.)

Astound (ăstau·nd), v. [f. c 1600 from the prec., either by treating it as a simple adj., and forming a factitive vb. on it, as in round, to round, or by taking it as the contracted form of a pa. pple. astounded, which implied a vb. to astound. (Cf. ME. send = sended, pa. pple. of SEND v.) The latter view is supported by the facts that the pple. astounded (see next) appears much earlier than the other parts of the verb, and that our earliest instance of the latter shows astound as (contracted) pa. tense. Analogous changes appear in the vb. sound, sounded, for OF. soner, suner, souner, ME. soun, pa. t. souned, soun'd, and in several other words. (Cf. esp. the vulgar drownd, drownded, for drown, drown'd.)]

Astrology (ăstrɒ·lŏdʒi). Forms: 4–7 astrologie, 4– astrology. [a. F. astrologie (14th c. in Littré), ad. L. astrologia, a. Gr. ἀστρολογία 'account of the stars,' f. ἀστρολόγ-ος 'telling of the stars,' subst. 'one who tells of the stars, an astronomer,' f. ἄστρον star + -λογος speaking, telling, f. λέγ-ειν to tell, speak. 'Αστρολόγος and ἀστρολογία were the earlier terms in Gr.; subsequently ἀστρονόμος and ἀστρονομία were introduced: see ASTRONOMY. Astrologia was likewise the earlier and pop. word in L., where also astronomia took its place as the scientific term, while astrologia passed into the sense of 'star-divination.' In OF. and ME. astronomie seems to be the earlier and general word, astrologie having been subseq. introduced for the 'art' or practical application of astronomy to mundane affairs, and thus gradually limited by 17th c. to the reputed influences of the stars, unknown to science. Not in Shakspere.]

1. gen. Practical astronomy; the practical application of astronomy as an art to human uses; esp. (in later usage) to the prediction of events natural or moral.

The original distinction between Astronomy the science, and Astrology the art, is clearly expressed by Gower Conf. III. 105–135. Chaucer's Treatise on the Astrolabe was a work of 'astrology,' i.e. practical astronomy.

'Astrology' was of two kinds:

†a. Natural Astrology: the calculation and foretelling of natural phenomena, as the measurement of time, fixing of Easter, prediction of tides and eclipses; also of meteorological phenomena. Obs.

This sense (exc. in Hist.) became obs. in 17th c., all the regular physical phenomena passing into the domain of Astronomy, and those that concerned the presumed influence of the moon and planets on the weather, etc., being called Astro-meteorology.

b. Judicial Astrology: the art of judging of the reputed occult and non-physical influences of the stars and planets upon human affairs; star-divination, astromancy. (The only meaning of 'Astrology' since end of 17th c.)

'Judiciary or Judicial Astrology, which we commonly call simply Astrology, is that which pretends to foretell moral events, i.e. such as have a dependence on the free will and agency of man; as if that were directed by the stars.' Chambers Cycl. 1727.

Astro- + Meteorology.] The investigation of the (alleged) influence upon the weather, climate, etc. of planetary and stellar phenomena, such as sun-spots, phases of the moon, comets, meteors, planetary conjunctions. This was a branch of the older natural astrology; and the term is often applied to a pretended prognostication of the weather, which is no better than modern 'astrology.'

'Αστρονόμος was a later word than ἀστρολόγος, and probably at first applied to those who mapped out the constellations; hence, both in Gr. and L., astronomia was a later and more scientific term than astrologia, which at length acquired the modern sense of astrology or star-prognostication. But in OF. and early Eng., astronomie seems to have been the term first used, and to have embraced the whole field of the ancient astrologia. At (æt, ăt), prep. Forms : 1–2 æt, 2–3 et (ed), 3–6 att, 5 ate, atte, 2– at. [Common Teut. ; OE. æt is cogn. with OS. at, OFris. (at) et, ON. at, OHG. az, Goth. at ; also with L. ad to, at, Skr. adhi near. Lost in mod.G. and Du., where its place is largely taken by to (G. zu, Du. toe), as is also the case in s. w. Eng. dialects ; in Scandinavian, on the other hand, to is lost, and its place largely taken by at, e. g. as sign of the infinitive mood, which is also the case in north. Eng. dialect. In OE. (as in the other Teut. langs.) æt governed the dative, only exceptionally the accusative. It was also compounded with many verbs : see AT-pref.[1], all of which are now obs. In ME. it coalesced with various cases of the 'definite article' in atte, attes, attere, 'at the' ; so also attam 'at them.']

At is used to denote relations of so many kinds, and some of these so remote from its primary local sense, that a classification of its uses is very difficult. Only a general outline can be here given ; its idiomatic constructions with individual words must be looked for under the words themselves, e.g. AIM, ANGRY, APT. It will be observed that when a verb is construed with at, the same construction usually obtains with the cognate sb. and adj., and when at is used with an adjective, it is generally used also with a derived sb. ; thus to envy, envy, envious at, apt, aptness at, etc. The arrangement of the senses here adopted is :—I. Local position. II. Practical contact, engagement, occupation, condition, etc. III. Position in a series or graduated scale, rate, price, etc. IV. Time, order, consequence, cause, object. V. In other adverbial phrases. VI. With the infinitive mood. VII. Followed by other prepositions.

I. Local position ; answering the question Where? (passing into Whereby? Whence? Whither?)

At expresses the position reached by completed motion to, or that which is left by motion from : lines drawn to a point, from a point, or through a point, meet or intersect at the point. Hence, with certain verbs, at comes into contact with through, from, or of, to, and toward. See 10–15 infra.

* Simple place or position.

1. The most general determination of simple localization in space, expressing, strictly, the simple relation of a thing to a point of space which it touches; hence, usually determining a point or object with which a thing or attribute is practically in contact, and thus the place where it is, when this is either so small as to be treated as a mere point, or when the exact relation between the thing and the place is not more particularly expressed by the prepositions close to, near, by, about, on, in, over, under, etc., all of which may at times be covered by at.

At, obsolete form of ATE, pa. t. of EAT.

At- pref.[1]:—OE. æt-. The preposition AT in composition, with force of 'at, close to, to'; frequent in OE., and retained in some words in ME., as at-stand(en to stand close to, 'adstare,' at-rech(en to reach to, get at, at-fore(n before, at-hind(en behind. In the oldest Eng. the prefix was æt- only when it bore the stress accent (i. e. in sbs. and adjs.); ot-, (op-, od-,) when unaccented (in vbs. and prepositions): thus, ætgrípe grasping at, apprehensive, otgrí'pan, opgrí'pan, to grip at, odbe'ran to bear to, bring, odle'wan (Goth. atawgjan to show). Northumbrian had sometimes æd-, ad-: cf. ATEW. The forms op, od, seem to have arisen in an early assimilation of ot- to óp-, ód-, from and-, the old accented form of AND-, ond-, occurring in the prep. ód, the meaning of which was not far removed from that of æt-, ot-. But in later OE. the strong form æt- (ME. at-, in south. dial. et-) was extended to all compounds, without regard to the position of the stress. Mod. Eng. has lost all these compounds, exc. that atwi'te survives in twit. Atone is a modern formation of a different kind.

At- pref.[2]:—OE. æt-. Representing earlier OE. op-, od-, unaccented form of tíd- 'away, from' = Gothic unpa- in unpa-pliuhan to flee away, G. ent- (in part), OHG. int-, in entfliehen, OHG. intfliohan, Du. ont- in ontvlieden to flee away. This od-, op-, from tíd-, being phonetically levelled with ód- from and-, and ot- the unaccented form of æt- being assimilated to the latter (see prec.), these three prefixes ran together in form, and when at a later time the accented form æt- took the place of its own weak form ot-, op-, od-, it also usurped the place of od- from and-, and ód- from tíd-, unp-. The last of these was by far the most frequent in use: hence the most common sense of at- prefix in ME. is 'from, away' = Gothic unpa-, Ger. ent-, as in at-bear to bear away, at-flee to flee away, at-go to go away. As tíd-, op-, had nearly the same sense as æf-, of-, these verbs in at- often take the place of corresponding vbs. in of-, as OE. ód-beran, æt-beran, = of-beran to bear away, ME. at-come = OE. of-cyman to come off, escape, etc. Several new compounds of this type arose in ME., and it was even irregularly extended to Fr. words, as in ATSCAPE, refashioned from ascape, OF. escaper. All these are now obsolete.

At- pref.[3]; assimilated form of L. ad- to, before t, used in all modern words from Latin. In OF. ad-, al-, was reduced to a-, and so introduced into ME., but afterwards refashioned as at-, after L spelling, both in Fr. and English, e.g. L. attingĕre, OF. ateindre, later atteindre, ME. ataindre, mod. attainder. The Eng. has also taken at- where Fr. retains the simple a-, as in OF. atorné, mod. atourné, ME. atorney, mod. attorney. The t was also erroneously doubled in various words in at- with prefix a- from other sources, as a(t)tame, a(t)tray, a(t)troke. See AD- pref.[2]

-ate, *suffix*¹, formerly -at, forming sbs. derived from L. sbs. in -ātus (-ato- and -atu-), -ātum, -āta, and their modern Romanic representatives.

1. In popular words which lived on into OFr., L. -ātus, -ātum, became (through -ato, -ado, -ad, -ed, -et) -é, as cārātus, senātus, avocātus, stātus, peccātum, OF. curé, sené, avoué, esté, péché; learned words, adapted from Latin, took -at, as in estat, prelat, primat, magistrat. After 13th c. many of the popular words were refashioned with -at, as sené, senat, avoué, avocat; and all new words have been thus formed, e.g. assassinat, attentat, épiscopat, palatinat, professorat, syndicat. In Eng. these were originally adopted in their Fr. form, estat, prelat, etc.; after 1400, -e was added to mark the long vowel, estate, prelate, etc, and all later words from Fr. took -ate at once. After these, Eng. words are formed directly on L., as curātus 'curate,' or on L. analogies, as alderman-ate, cf. triumvir-ate. In meaning, words in -ate are chiefly: a. Substantives denoting office or function, or the persons performing it, as marquisate, professorate, episcopate, syndicate, aldermanate. b. Participial nouns, as legate 'one deputed,' prelate 'one preferred,' mandate 'a thing commanded,' precipitate 'what is thrown down.' c. Chemical terms, denoting salts formed by the action of an acid on a base, as nitrate, acetate, sulphate, carbonate, alcoholate, ethylate. In the 18th c. chemists said plumbum acetatum 'acetated lead,' lead acted on by vinegar, whence substantively acetatum the acetated (product), the 'acetate'; cf. precipitate, sublimate, distillate. (In the dog-latin of pharmacy, acetas, -ātis, is ignorantly put for acetātum.)

2. In some words, -ate = F. -ate, ad. L. or It. -āta, as in pirate, frigate.

-ate, *suffix*², formerly -at, forming participial adjectives from L. pa. ppples. in -ātus, -āta, -ātum, being only a special instance of the adoption of L. pa. ppples. by dropping the inflexional endings, e.g. content-us, convict-us, direct-us, remiss-us, or with phonetic final -e, e.g. complēt-us, finīt-us, revolūt-us, spars-us. The analogy for this was set by the survival of some L. pa. ppples. in OF., as confus = confūsus, content: —contentus, divers: —diversus. This analogy was widely followed in later Fr., in introducing new words from Latin; and both classes of Fr. words, i.e. the popular survivals and the later accessions, being adopted in Eng., provided Eng. in its turn with analogies for adapting similar words directly from L., by dropping the termination. This began about 1400, and as in -ate¹ (with which this suffix is phonetically identical), L. -ātus gave -at, subsequently -ate. e.g. desolātus, desolat, desolate, separātus, separat, separate. Many of these participial adjectives soon gave rise to causative verbs, identical with them in form (see next), to which, for some time, they did duty as pa. ppples., as 'the land was desolate by war'; but, at length, regular pa. ppples. were formed with the native suffix -ed, upon the general use of which these earlier participial adjs. generally lost their participial force, and either became obs. or remained as simple adjectives, as in 'the desolate land,' 'a compact mass.' (But cf. situate = situated.) So aspirate, moderate, prostrate, separate; and (where a vb. has not been formed), innate, oblate, ornate, sedate, temperate, etc. As the Fr. repr. of L. -atus is -é, English words in -ate have also been formed directly after Fr. words in -é, e.g. affectionné, affectionate.

3. As with Eng. -ed, L. ppl. adjs. in -ātus were also formed on nouns, etc., when no other part of the vb. was required, as cauda tail, caudātus tailed, and often with negatives, as sensus sense, insensātus unprovided with sense. In modern times these have been liberally adopted in Eng., and on their analogy, or that of corresponding Fr. words in -é, new words are constantly formed where L. actually had not the formation, as apiculate, f. apiculus a little point; lunulate, f. lunula little moon; roseate, f. roseus rosy; angustifoliate, f. angustum narrow + folium leaf.

3. Many words, originally adj, are also used substantively, e.g. delegate, reprobate, precipitate, carbonate, alcoholate, and have gone to reinforce the number of the earlier sbs. in -ate¹, q.v.

-ate, *suffix*³, a verbal formative, used to english L. verbs of the first conjugation, and to form Eng. verbs on other L. words or elements. This use originated in the formation of verbs from the participial adjs. in -ate mentioned under -ate².

1. In OE., verbs had been regularly formed on adjectives, as hwīt hwītian, wearm wearmian, bysig bysgian, drȳge drȳgan, etc. With the loss of the inflexions, these verbs became, by the 15th c., identical in form with the adjs., e.g. to white, warm, busy, dry, empty, dirty, etc.

2. In Latin, vbs. were also freely formed on adjectives, as siccus siccāre, clārus clārāre, līber līberāre, sacer sacrāre. This prevailed still more extensively in Fr., e.g. sec sécher, clair clairer, content contenter, confus confuser, etc. Thence also Eng. received many verbs, which by the 15th c. were identical in form with their adjectives, e.g. to clear, humble, manifest, confuse, etc.

3. On these analogies Eng. adjectives formed from L. pa. ppples. began generally, in the 16th c., to yield verbs of identical form, e.g. adj. direct, vb. to direct; adj. separate, vb. to separate; adj. aggravate, vb. to aggravate: precisely analogous to adj. busy, vb. to busy; adj. content, vb. to content.

4. These verbs, though formed immediately from participial adjectives already in English, answered in form to the pa. ppples. of L. verbs of the same meaning. It was thus natural to associate them directly with these L. verbs, and to view them as their regular Eng. representatives.

5. This once done, it became the recognized method of englishing a Latin verb, to take the ppl. stem of the L. as the present stem of the Eng.; so that Eng. verbs were now formed on L. pa. ppples. by mere analogy, and without the intervention of a participial adjective. In accordance with this, fascinate, concatenate, asseverate, venerate, and hundreds of others, have been formed directly on the participial stems of L. fascināre, concatēnāre, asseverāre, venerāri, etc, without having been preceded by a cognate adjective. In the case of many words introduced in the 16th c., evidence is wanting to show whether the vb. was preceded by, or contemporaneous with, the ppl. adj. in -ate.

6. These Eng. vbs. in -ate correspond generally to Fr. vbs. in -er (:—L. -āre), as Eng. separate, create, F. séparer, créer: this in its turn gave an analogy for the formation of Eng verbs from French; as F. isoler (ad. It. isolare :—L. insulāre), Eng. isolate; F. féliciter, Eng. felicitate.

7. Latin vbs. in -āre might, analogically, have been formed on many words, on which they were not actually formed; wherever such a vb. might have existed, a F. vb. in -er, and an Eng. vb. in -ate, are liable to be formed. Thus nōbilitās gave in L. nōbilitāre, the Eng. representative of which is nobilitate; fēlicitas, which might have given fēlicitāre, has given F. féliciter and Eng. felicitate; and capācitas, which might have given L. capācitāre and F. capaciter, has actually given Eng. capacitate. Hence numerous modern verbs, as differentiate, substantiate, vaccinate; including many formed on modern or foreign words, as adipocerate, assassinate, camphorate, methylate.

(It is possible that the analogy of native verbs in -t, with the pa. pple. identical in form with the infinitive, as set, hit, put, cut, contributed also to the establishment of verbs like direct, separat e, identical with their pa. pples.)

1625 Browning Men & Wom. I. 27 Till the stalks of it seem a-tingle.

-ation (-ē·ʃən), the particular form of the compound suffix -T-ION (-s-ion, -x-ion), which forms nouns of action from L. pples. in -āt-us of vbs. in -āre, Fr. vbs. in -er, and their English representatives. As mentioned under -TION (q.v.), the living form of L. -ātiōn-em in OF. was -aisun, -eisun, whence ME. -aisun, -eisun, -esun, mod. -eason, -ison; cf. ratiōn-em, reisun, REASON; ōrātiōn-em, ureisun, ORISON. All F. words in -ation (OF. -acium, ME. -acium, -acioun, -acyon) were of later and literary introduction from Latin, though many of them already existed before the earliest introduction of F. words into English, where, in theological writings, passium occurs c 1175, and sauvacium c 1225. In French, vbs. in -er:—L. -āre, far outnumber all others; they also constitute the type on which all recent verbs are formed; hence, nouns in -ation exceed in number not only the early words in -sun, -cun, -ssun, but all the other forms of -tion. In English, they number more than 1500 in modern use; the obsolete examples amount to several hundred more: see, within a few pages, apostrophation, apparation, appendication, appreciation, appunctuation, aquation, argutation, ariolation, artation, asperation, aspernation, assectation, assecuration, assedation, assemblation. A few have no accompanying verb in English use, e. g. constellation, duration, lunation, negation, oration, ovation; the great majority have a verb in -ate, e. g. cre-ate, -ation, moder-ate, -ation, satur-ate, -ation; some are formed on Gr. vbs. in -IZE (of which the L. was, or would be, -izāre, Fr. -iser), or their imitations, e. g. organise, -ation, civilise, -ation: the remainder have a vb. without suffix, derived through Fr., either with or without modification; e g. modi-fy, -fication, appl-y, -ication, publ-ish, -ication, prove, probation; alter-ation, caus-ation, cit-ation, command-ation, consult ation, embarkation, fix-ation, form-ation, not-ation, plant-ation, quot-ation, tax-ation, tempt ation, vex ation, visitation. To the mere English speaker the latter have the effect of being formed immediately on the Eng. verbs alter, cause, embark, fix, plant, tax, vex, visit, etc.; and -ation thus assumes the character of a living Eng. suffix. Hence, it comes to be applied to verbs not of Fr. origin, as in starv-ation, flirt-ation, bother-ation, backward-ation. For the meaning, see -TION; words in which -ation is, or seems to be, merely added to the verb, are synonymous with the verbal substantive in -ing; already in 17th c. the use of vexation, visitation, etc. instead of vexing visiting, etc. (flirtation, starvation had not yet been heard of) was ridiculed thus:

1638 Randolph Amyntas I. iii. 32 Thestylis. But what languages does they speake, servant? Mopsus. Several languages, as Cawation, Chirpation, Hoccation, Whistleation, Growlation, Cackleation, Shriekation, Himation. The. And Spellation!

A-tiptoe (ătĭ·ptō), advb. phr. [see A prep.[1]] On tiptoe, on the tips of one's toes (either to raise oneself higher, or to move about noiselessly).

1556 R. Scot Hop Gard. 43 They must stand longwyse, as it were a tiptoe. 1647 R. Stapylton Juvenal 98 She sure must stand a-tipto for a kisse. 1751 Smollett *Per. -ative, ad. F. -atif, -ative, L. -ātīvus, consisting of adj. suffix -īvus (see -IVE) appended to ppl. stems in -āt- of vbs. in -āre, e. g. dēmonstrāre to point out, dēmonstrāt-īvus 'having the attribute or habit of pointing out, tending to point out.' Only a few were used in Latin, but the analogy is extensively followed in the modern languages. In the majority of instances, as in demonstrate, demonstrative, adjs. in -ative belong to vbs. in -ate; cases like represent, -ative, affirm, -ative, figure, figurative, in which the Eng. vb. represents (through Fr.) the present stem of the Latin, have afforded a formal analogy for talk, talk-ative.

A few adjs. of this class are moreover formed directly from sbs. in -TY, as if from an intervening verb in -tate, which does not exist; e.g. AUTHORITY, (authoritate*), authoritative; so qualitative, quantitative.

1. a. The spheroidal gaseous envelope surrounding any of the heavenly bodies. b. esp. The mass of aeriform fluid surrounding the earth; the whole body of terrestrial air.

The name was invented for the ring or orb of vapour or 'vaporous air' supposed to be exhaled from the body of a planet, and so to be part of it, which the air itself was not considered to be; it was extended to the portion of surrounding air occupied by this, or supposed to be in any way 'within the sphere of the activity' of the planet (Phillips 1696); and finally, with the progress of science, to the supposed limited aeriform environment of the earth or other planetary or stellar body. (It is curious that the first mention of an atmosphere is in connexion with the Moon, now believed to have none.)

Attach (ătæ·tʃ), v. Also 4 atache, 4–7 attache. Sc. 6 atteche, atteiche. [a. OF. atachie-r (mod. attacher), cogn. with It. attaccare, Sp. atacar; f. à to, at + a radical which is found also in détacher Detach, and is connected by Diez and Littré with the Genevese tache, Sp., Pg. tacha, a round-headed nail, a Tack, q.v. Thus lit. 'to tack to.' See Diez, Littré, Skeat.]

The development of signification seems to have been thus: 1. The regular OF. sense was 'to fasten,' as in mod.Eng., where however this sense is of quite recent adoption from mod.F. 2. The earlier Eng. sense of 'arrest, seize,' arose in AF. and Eng., as an elliptical expression for 'attach by some tie to the control or jurisdiction of a court,' i. e. so that it shall have a hold on the party. A man might thus be attachd or 'nailed,' par le cors by his body, par ses avers et par ses chateus by his goods and chattels, par pleges by sureties for his appearance (Britton). In the first two cases the attachment consisted in arrest and detention. 3. The It. equivalent is attaccare: in the 16th c. the It. attaccare battaglia to join battle, attaccarsi a to fasten (oneself) upon, 'attack,' was first imitated with F. attacher, and then adapted in Fr. as attaquer; whence Eng. Attack, and occasional 17th c. use of attach (see 4 infra).

[a. OF. aturné, aturné, atourné, pa. pple. masc. of atourner to Attorn, in sense of 'one appointed or constituted,' whence all the specific uses. (The statement found in the law dictionaries for the last 200 years, that the word means one 'who acts in the turn of another,' is a bad guess.) For spelling cf. Attorn.]

2. (Attorney in fact, private attorney.) One duly appointed or constituted (by Letter or Power of Attorney) to act for another in business and legal matters, either generally, as in payment, receipt, and investment of money, in suing and being sued, etc., or in some specific act, which the principal, by reason of absence, is unable to perform in person.

Hence the contrast between 'in person' and 'by attorney,' frequent also in fig. senses.

3. (Attorney-at-Law, public attorney.) A professional and properly-qualified legal agent practising in the courts of Common Law (as a solicitor practised in the courts of Equity); one who conducted litigation in these courts, preparing the case for the barristers, or counsel, whose duty and privilege it is to plead and argue in open court.

(This sense slowly disengaged itself from the preceding, as a body of professional legal agents was recognized and incorporated. The actual duties and privileges of the attorney-at-law also varied with time and place; in earlier times, as still in some of the United States of America, the distinction between attorney and counsel did not exist. (Cf. next sense.) From an early period the name was often used reproachfully as almost = 'knave or swindler': see quotations under b. By the Judicature Act of 1873, the title, never used in Scotland, was abolished in England, 'attorneys' being merged in the 'Solicitors of the Supreme Court.')

The designation began in England, where this officer was at first merely the king's attorney (see above 6, called from the reign of Edward IV, 'the king's general attorney,' to distinguish him from those appointed to act on special occasions, or in particular courts. The descriptive designation seems to have grown into a title during the 16th c. The A. G. is now a member of the Ministry (but not of the Cabinet), and usually has a seat in the House of Commons.

4. A quality or character considered to belong to or be inherent in a person or thing; a characteristic quality.

1836-7 Sir W. Hamilton Metaph. viii. (1870) I. 151 Attribute is a word properly convertible with quality, for every quality is an attribute and every attribute is a quality; but in our language, custom has introduced a certain distinction in their application. Attribute is considered as a word of loftier signification, and is, therefore, conventionally limited to qualities of a higher application. Thus, for example, it would be felt as indecorous to speak of the qualities of God, and as ridiculous to talk of the attributes of matter.

(This distinction is hardly borne out by historical usage. Originally, 'the attributes of God' was preferred probably because men assumed no knowledge of the actual qualities of the Deity, but only of those more or less fitly 'attributed' him; i. e. 'attributes' in sense 2. But the exalted sense 2 may have associated itself with the expression in the minds of many who used it. J. A. H. M.)

The L. ūrus and Gr. οὖρος were adopted from the OTeut. word, of which the derivation is uncertain.]

Historically and properly, the name of an extinct species of Wild Ox (Bos Urus Owen, B. primigenius Boj.), described by Cæsar as Urus, which formerly inhabited Europe, including the British Isles, and survived until comparatively recent times in Prussia, Poland, and Lithuania. Since this became extinct, the name has often been erroneously applied to another species, the European Bison (Bos Bison Gesn., B. bonasus Linn.), still extant in the forests of Lithuania, in which sense it is used by some English naturalists.

In early mod. G. aurux, aurochs, was still applied to the Urus, and only since its disappearance (in 17th c.) has been popularly misapplied to the Bison, in which sense it was unfortunately adopted by some naturalists, before the facts were known. More recent authors have sought to remedy the mistake by introducing the form Urox (MHG. ûr-ochse) for the Urus, while retaining Aurochs for the Bison; but as Urox and Aurochs are only the earlier and later form of the same name, this is historically indefensible, and the only accurate nomenclature is to distinguish the two animals as Urus (or Urox), and Bison improperly called Aurochs. 5. A luminous atmospheric phenomenon, now considered to be of electrical character, occurring in the vicinity of, or radiating from, the earth's northern or southern magnetic pole, and visible from time to time by night over more or less of the adjoining hemisphere, or even of the earth's surface generally; popularly called the Northern (or Southern) Lights, merry-dancers, streamers, etc.

The northern lights, being alone conspicuous in Europe, had from the earliest periods various popular names in the northern languages; they began to attract scientific attention early in the 17th c., and were described by Gassendi in 1621 under the descriptive appellation of aurora borealis or 'northern dawn,' their simplest form suggesting the appearance of dawn or approaching sunrise on the northern horizon; this appellation occasionally varied as aurora septentrionalis) passed into general scientific use. On the recognition of similar phenomena in the antarctic regions, these were called aurora australis or 'southern lights'; whence aurora is now used generically as the proper term for the phenomenon, without any thought of 'dawn,' and with English plural auroras; and this has become the ordinary prose meaning of aurora, the preceding senses being only poetical.

1621 [1822 Burrowes Cycl. s.v., On Sept. 2nd, 1621, the same phenomenon was seen all over France; and it was particularly described by Gassendus in his Physics, who gave it the name of aurora borealis.] 1727 *Phil. [The etymology of avanis has been variously sought in Arabic, Persian, Turkish: see Devic, in Littré's Suppl., and

G. P. Marsh, Notes and Additions to Wedgwood. The variant Arabic form awārī (whence Eng. avaria, avarria, above) as well as original correspondence of meaning, suggests a connexion with It. avaria—see AVERAGE sb. : in fact Mr. Marsh proposed the derivation of the latter from this word. But on the other hand, the various and uncertain forms of the word in Arabic may be merely adaptations of Fr. avarie or It. avaria, assimilated to native words or roots (e.g. awār oppression, injustice, hawān contempt, etc.) 'The plur. awaniez is now in popular use in Syria, to express government exactions, the singular signifying aid, help, just as benevolence in Europe sometimes meant a compulsory tax' (Marsh). The word has been adopted in It. and Pg. in the transferred sense: It. avania 'an undeserved wrong, a secret grudge, an insulting injury' (Florio); Pg. avania 'wrong, injury' (Vieyra).]

The words are: 'Ave [Maria] gratia plena, Dominus tecum; benedicta tu in mulieribus; et benedictus fructus ventris tui [Jesus; Amen]. Sancta Maria, Mater Dei, ora pro nobis peccatoribus nunc et in hora mortis nostræ.' (The words Jesus, Amen, were added by Pope Urban IV, 1261–66. Aver, obs. form of A-FIRE and EVER.

Aver-, in some compound terms pertaining to feudal usage, appears to be connected with AVERAGE sb.[1] Of these terms, we have only the explanations (usually inferences from the assumed derivation) offered by legal editors of 16th and 17th centuries, which are of very doubtful value:—

†1. Aver-corn. ? Corn paid as a feudal due or in lieu of service.

[1263 Charter in Thorn Chron. 1912/2 Quoddam servitium annuum quod avercorn vocatur, sub mensura minus certa.] 1670 BLOUNT Law Dict., Aver-corn, is such Corn, as by Custom is brought by the Tenants Carts or Carriages to the Lords Granary or Barn. ?1695 KENNETT Gloss., Avercorn a reserved rent in corn paid to religious houses by their tenants or farmers.

†2. Averland. ? Land subject to 'average.'

1670 BLOUNT Law Dict., Averland, Item Cellarius libere solebat capere omnia sterquilinia ad suum opus in omni vico, nisi ante ostia eorum qui habebant Averland. Mon. Angl. I. par. fol. 302. a. It seems to have been such Land as the Tenants did plow and manure, cum averlis suis, for the proper Use of a Monastery or Lord of the Soil: [Chron. J. de Brakelonda 75] Quod autem nunc vocatur Averland, fuit terra rusticorum, which was subject to Averages, or the Lord's Carriages.

†3. Averpenny. ? Money paid in lieu of 'average.' (Cf. AVERAGE[1] quot. 1206)

1253-1278 St. M. Magd. Coll. MS. in 4th Rep. R. Com. Hist. MSS. (1874) 459/1 [Richard II. 1378, 12 May. Confirmation to the Knights Hospitallers of charters granted to the Templars by Henry III in 1224, and 1253; of which charters the latter .. exempts them from all taxes and tolls, including] wardepeny et averpeny et hundredepeny et horghelpeny et thethingepeny. 1579 RASTELL Expos. Terms 26 Averpeny, that is to bee quite of diuers summes of money for the kinges auerages. 1691 BLOUNT Law Dict., Averpeny (quasi average-peny) is Money contributed towards the Kings Averages, or Money given to be freed thereof.

†4. Aver-silver. ? = Aver-penny. (Halliwell suggests: 'A custom or rent so called, originating from the cattle, or avers of the tenants of the soil.')

Average, sb.[1] Old Law. Forms: 5- average; Sc. 6 avarage, arage, arrage, aryage, 6-9 arriage. [In OF. average (Godef.) and med (Anglo-) L. averagium, apparently the same as avera in Domesday Book, explained by Spelman as 'one day's work which the king's tenants gave to the sheriff.' In the vernacular form, only in Scotch, where also phonetically worn down to arage (cf. laverok, lark, favorand, farrand), and spelt arriage in association with carriage. Origin uncertain.

Early explanations evidently treated avera as latinised form of OF. ovre, uvre work. Sir J. Skene referred it to aver 'beast of burden,' and so explained the meaning; but his proposed explanation (since repeated in the Law Dicts.) is hardly supported by the early use of averagium and OF. average. Danish hoverl 'average, soccage-duty,' suggested by Wedgwood, is (with its Romance suffix) a more recent word than averagium, and not possibly its source. Mr. C. I. Elton, from the actual use of avera, is disposed to revert to the idea of referring it to OF. ovre, uvre, its form being perhaps affected by the use of avere, aver, for property and cattle. He compares averagium with F. ouvrage, and med.L. operagium.]

Some kind of service due by tenants to the feudal superior. Explained in the Law Dictionaries, since Sir J. Skene, as 'service done by the tenant with his beasts of burden' (see above). Known chiefly in the phrase 'arriage and carriage,' retained in Scotch leases till 20 Geo. II, but having in later times no definitely ascertained meaning.

2. Any charge or expense over and above the freight incurred in the shipment of goods, and payable by their owner. (In this sense it still occurs in petty average, and the now inoperative phrase, average accustomed in Bills of Lading: see quotations 1540 and 1865.)

4. The incidence of any such charge, expense, or loss; esp. the equitable distribution of expense or loss, when of general incidence, among all the parties interested, in proportion to their several interests.

Particular Average is the incidence of the partial loss or damage of ship, cargo, or freight, through unavoidable accident, upon the individual owners (or insurers) of these respective interests.

General Average is apportionment of loss caused by intentional damage to ship e.g. cutting away of masts or boats), or sacrifice of cargo and consequent loss of freight, or of expense incurred by putting into a port in distress, by acceptance of towage or other services, to secure the general safety of ship and cargo; in which case contribution is made by the owners (or insurers) of ship, cargo, and freight in proportion to the value of their respective interests.

(In connexion with Maritime Law and Marine Insurance this has come to be the prevailing sense of the word. Its first known occurrence is in the 14th c. Civil Statute of Cataro (Pardessus V. 97, where it is enacted that anything given as a present or 'Christmas-box' (pro strena), or paid in tribute (pedocia), with the consent of the majority, for the good of the vessel, shall be shared by way of average (illud dividatur per avariam). Cf. quot. 1603, 1727.)

1598 W. Phillip Linschoten's Trav. in Arb. Garner III. 413 In their ships there is no Average. b. Attrib. and Comb., as average-adjuster, -stater, one whose profession it is to adjust the claims and liabilities of all parties concerned in a case of General Average, and to make up an average-statement showing the same.

Average bond, a guarantee given to the master of the ship by the consignees of a cargo liable to General Average, by which they undertake that if he delivers the cargo, they will pay the general average contribution as soon as its amount is authoritatively determined.

II. Transferred use.

5. transf. The distribution of the aggregate inequalities (in quantity, quality, intensity, etc.) of a series of things among all the members of the series, so as to equalize them, and ascertain their common or mean quantity, etc., when so treated; the determination or statement of an arithmetical mean; a medial estimate. Now only in phrases at an average, on an average.

[Few words have received more etymological investigation: see Diez, Dory, Littré, Wedgwood, E. Müller, Skeat, etc., and especially the fruitful researches of the late G. P. Marsh in the American edition of Wedgwood (New York 1861). The latter has conclusively shown that, as a maritime term, avaria, averia, was first used in the Mediterranean, and that its original meaning was duty charged upon goods, in connexion with this cf. also quotations from Muratori Chron. Parmense (in Du Cange s.v. Averia), e.g. Concenderint lembum Averiæ ad excipiendas prædictas galeonas, 'they went on board the revenue cutter to intercept the aforesaid galleons.' These results quite dispose of the two derivations suggested in Diez from Ger. hafen haven, and Arab. awar loss, damage, the latter being merely a mod. Arabic translation and adaptation of the western term in its latest sense. Mr. Marsh's connexion of the word with the Arabic or Turkish avania, avaria, is of great weight; but as said under Avania, that word is more probably adopted from the Franks. May not averia be a derivative of It. avere, OF. aveir, property, goods (see Aver sb.), in sense of 'charge on property or goods'? Compare such terms as tonnage, poundage, pollage (charge on polls). The chief difficulty lies in the early It. form avaria, not averia, and F. avarie: the Catalan has however been averia since 13th c.: see Marsh on Sp. and Catalan use of the word, and Averia, Avaria in Du Cange. It is to be noted that OF. avarie was used of other than maritime dues or charges; in a document dated Nicosia, 18 March 1468, in De Mas Latrie, Histoire de Chypre III. 276, the owner of a mill is bound 'de paier l'ensençive (=cens) de l'abaie de Bibi, et tout autre avarie que le dit moulin paie aujourdhui.' Cf. also certain uses of avérage in Godefroy.]

This mistake began in mod. L. or Fr.: Cotgrave (1611) has 'averruncquer, to purge, or weed; to turne, put, or take away euill; to divert mischiefes; also to appease'; where the perverted sense is put first. Bailey (1731) essayed to accommodate the spelling to the new sense, by entering the fictitious variant aberuncate, adopted from him by Johnson, and later dictionaries. b. Const. from, to.

The use of the prep. to, rather than from, after averse and its derivatives, although condemned by Johnson as etymologically improper, is justified by the consideration that these words express a mental relation analogous to that indicated by hostile, contrary, repugnant, hostility, opposition, dislike, and naturally take the same construction. Aversion in the sense of an action, which would properly be followed by from, is now obsolete. Examination of many instances shows that from has been used by Donne, Speed, R. Burton, Milton, Bp. Mountagu, Sir T. Browne, Evelyn, Hale, Dryden, Pope, Johnson, Southey, Motley, Lowell, and J. R. Green; to by Heylin, Walton, Boyle, Locke, South, Addison, Steele, De Foe, D. North, Richardson, H. Walpole, Gibbon, Burke, Buckle, Mill; whilst Sir E. Sandys, Jer. Taylor, Barrow, Clarendon, Swift, Hume, Macaulay have used both. Shakspere does not use the word.
